D) ROAD I.D. BAND

Since we're on a safety kick, here's another great piece that could help first responders get vital info in the event you are too injured to remember which way is up. Sometimes riders take their safety and health for granted and an unfortunate turn is sometimes only inches away. Do you know all your riding buddies last names, blood types or medical allergies? This simple lightweight band is even more important for solo riders. We've all had bad crashes before and we're usually lucky enough to stay conscious or close enough to make our way out. Play it safe and check out Road ID's many options on identification and make your mom happy.

F) NATIVE ENDO SUNGLASSES

With riding season in full swing and the summer sun blaring down during these long days, eye protection is a key piece of gear and Native has just sent us a nice set to do just that. Native's revolutionary Anti-Ocular Intrusion System is designed to prevent lenses from dislodging rearward and shooting into your eye in the event of impact. Now for those rides when we are able to stay vertical these glasses will still protect their user with quality interchangeable lenses that are polarized for ultimate vision. Another nice feature on the Endo's are the vents above the frame. It takes a more casual style sunglasses and makes it functional on the trail. While on the trail we prefer a bit lighter pair like Native's Endura, this is a great functional yet casual sunglasses that will work well at the pumptrack or short rides.

E) RYDERS NORTH SHORE GOGGLE

After years of riding with moto-inspired goggles, Ryders decided to take matters into their own hands and design a mountain bike-specific goggle from the lens out. One of the big issues with goggles is fogging lenses. Now not all of you out there are mouth breathers, but even still, from time-to-time we've all been at the top of a run or a slow techy section and had some condensation in the lens. Ryder's goggles have specially placed vents that isolate airflow from the rider's breath and work to channel incoming cool air. They also design the goggle to fit in mountain bike-specific helmets where moto goggles can sometimes sit awkwardly due to their size. This is an all-around great goggle that really does what it is supposed to do and props to Ryders for creating something specifically for mountain bikers.
